The Great War was also not fought by professional armies. The conflict was marked by mass mobilisation, training, indoctrination, alliances, innovation, experimentation, agility and frustration. Like all conflict, it was also based on failures; from the start of the campaign, military operations never yielded the decisive results that had been predicted.

1917's popularity and critical acclaim has also provided history teachers with a vital moment to consider how The Great War is remembered and learned. A close and careful study of World War I allows students to critically think about how rapid industrialization, globalization, imperialism and complex alliances all shaped the pre-War landscape and how these factors served as the catalysts of war.
